2	GPEW	9-21	replace	However young people do not go to vote (..... until line 21) continues to look exactly the same.'	A fundamental reason why some young people are not engaging in politics across Europe is the lack of candidates who look like them and are living the experiences they are. Green Parties across Europe recognise the importance of adequate representation. There are Young Greens elected to Helsinki City Council, several younger green members of the Swedish parliament, across councils in the UK and the Netherlands, and in the European Parliament, but we need to push further and focus more on candidates that have a better chance of being elected, which look and sound like our voter base, young people. No generation has a monopoly on knowledge and power, and the EGP commits to supporting candidates from the age of eligibility to run to ensure diversity and inclusivity in public office.	CAS accepted as amended: A fundamental reason why some young people are not engaging in politics across Europe is the lack of candidates who look like them and are living the experiences they are. Too few political parties have been successful in addressing the main concerns of young people and are not bringing the ultimate progressive solutions that young people want. Green Parties across Europe recognise the importance of adequate representation. For example, there are several younger green members of the Swedish and Scottish parliament, across councils in the UK and The Netherlands, and in the European Parliament. However, we need to push further and focus more on candidates that have a better chance of being elected, which look and sound like our voter base, young people. No generation has a monopoly on knowledge and power, and the EGP commits to supporting candidates from the age of eligibility to run to ensure diversity and inclusivity in public office.

3	Groen Links	17-21	delete	The truth is, however, that politics is still often seen as a place where wise older people have to take the difficult decisions. And while other, even highly conservative, parts of society, including parts of Hollywood and corporate boards, are listening to public pressure and becoming increasingly diverse, the political arena is lagging behind and continues to look exactly the same.		falls
4	EELV	46	add new bullet point		By acknowledging the lack of representativity of youth within the political arena, we also want to raise the issue of political representativity as a whole. What is true for the youth is indeed also true for women and minorities, disabled persons, migrants and ethnic minorities, LGBTIQs and so on. Yet there is another matter for worries: the recent sociological polls show that political representation within the EU, both within the member states and the European institutions, are more and more absorbed by the upper classes and that fewer and fewer workers and people from the lower classes have access to political representation. Green movements should try and find ways to better include these different parts of the population to the political life and help them get into the institution. This will also rely upon our capacity to limit the political mandates in length and number and favour the renewal of political life.	For CAS V: First part: Acknowledging the lack of representation of youth also raises the issue of political representation in general. Young women, LGBTIQ youth and youth from other underrepresented groups face multilayered structural discrimination which Green parties and Green youth organisations must be equipped to tackle in order to ensure diverse representation and sharing of power among youth as a whole. CAS (III) Accepted as amended: What's more, in some countries, people hold multiple offices or multiple terms and this is a real obstacle for renewal and for young people to get to political responsibilities.
5	Miljöpartiet de Gröna	48	add points after	"With reference to the above, the EGP and its member parties commit to..."	"Giving youth-wing representatives the opportunity to represent the mother party in external debates whose topics aim mainly at young people." and "Reserve at least one seat for a representative from the youth-wing in every board within the mother party."	CAS accepted first sentence. + VOTE on second sentence as amended: "Encourage to have at least one seat for a representative from the youth-wing in every board within the mother party."
